Bolivia: Assassination in Paris

The assassination last week in Paris of General Joaquin Zenteno, Bolivian ambassador to France, bears a marked similarity to the murder of Colonel Ramon Trabal, the Uruguayan military attache who was shot in his Paris apartment in December 1974.

In each case previously unknown terrorist groups claimed responsibility for the murder. A group calling itself the Raul Sendic International Brigade (named for the founder of the Tupamaros) took credit for Trabal's "execution," and the "Che Guevara International Brigade" claims it eliminated Zenteno.

Both men had prominent roles in eradicating leftist subversive groups in their own countries before being posted to Paris. Trabal served as chief of military security in Uruguay and had a primary responsibility for planning and directing the campaign against the Tupamaros. He reportedly was given a diplomatic assignment at the request of army superiors who resented his ambition and ability.

Zenteno achieved international prominence in 1967 for tracking down and capturing Che Guevara; he later became commander in chief of the armed forces—the second most powerful position in Bolivia. He went into "golden exile" in 1973 following a serious disagreement with President Banzer over administrative and political matters.

It is possible that an international organization, based in Argentina, that calls itself the Revolutionary Coordinating Junta is responsible for either or both assassinations.

this group is led by representatives of subversive groups in Bolivia, Uruguay, Paraguay, Chile, Brazil, and Argentina and is dedicated to the violent overthrow of military-backed governments in those countries.

Bankers in Buenos Aires who have been the victims of terrorist kidnaping operations their ransom money was paid in gold and deposited in banks in Beirut and in unmarked Swiss accounts in Italy. 3.3(b)(1)

In the past, Latin American terrorists generally confined their operations to their own countries, but many observers predict that operations now will be modeled on the activities of Middle East terrorist groups and will occur anywhere.
